Review

"Miller's book pair merits praise for the breadth of its empirically-informed approach to virtue ethics. And, hopefully, the philosophical work Miller's response-rich arguments will inevitably inspire will mirror his precision of writing and argumentation... a welcome addition to a body of literature whose development Miller's book pair significantly and compellingly advances." --Mind

"...Miller's writing is a model of philosophical clarity and readers who want to see how philosophy can be informed by psychology will want to read these books."

"I recommend the book as a resource for the work in psychology as it is relevant to virtue ethics. It would be a useful teaching aid in that it would both give students valuable new information and be personally enlightening to them. It would also provide much grist for excellent discussion." -- Philosophy in Review

Christian Miller presents a new account of moral character. Most of our friends, colleagues, and even family members are not virtuous people. They do not have virtues such as compassion, honesty, or courage. But at the same time, they are not vicious people either. They do not have vices such as cruelty, dishonesty, or cowardice. Instead most people today have characters which do not qualify as either virtuous or vicious. They have many positive moral features, but also many negative ones too. Our characters are decidedly mixed, and are much more complex than we might have thought.

On the one hand, many of us would kill an innocent person in a matter of minutes under pressure from an authority figure as part of a psychology study. Or we would pretend to not see someone collapse from an apparent heart attack across the street. Or we would make a wide circle around someone's dropped papers rather than stop to help pick them up. Yet it is also true that many of us would help another person when we are by ourselves and hear sounds of a non-ambiguous emergency in the next room. Or we would come to the aid of a friend when feeling empathy for her need, and do so for altruistic rather than egoistic reasons.

In Moral Character: An Empirical Theory Miller outlines a new picture of our moral character which involves what are called Mixed Character Traits. This picture can help make sense of how most of us are less than virtuous people but also morally better than the vicious.
